Just in case anyone still has trouble viewing your website in MS Explorer, or doesn't want to use Explorer, now they can use Firefox instead. It seems that certain portions of the site will work fine in Firefox without resetting the page style, but certain pages don't display the links as active hyperlinks; it just won't let you click on it. It acts like regular text. So, resetting the page style makes the hyperlink active.

This will disable the text effects (color, bold, italic, highlight, etc.), but the links will become active. The images will still be displayed but they might get moved around the screen a little bit.

On the menu bar, open the View menu, then Page Style, and select No Style. To restore the text effects and disable the hyperlinks again, go back to the View Menu, Page Style, and select Basic Page Style.
